The date for the coronation of the Czar of Russia is rapidly drawing nigh; and the condition of Moscow, even at the present time, is suggestive of the cordial feeling of the inhabitants, and of the enthusiastic loyalty which will, later, be demonstrated in the presence of the Emperor of all the Russias. Seventy-five thousand picked troops now garrison the city—merely, of course, to add to the splendor of the welcoming spectacle; and the detective force has been so increased, that even the man who chops your wood for a square meal and a pannikin of vodka is, in nine cases out of ten, a member of the very plain clothes constabulary. The triumphal arches will be composed exclusively of chevaux-de-frise and bayonet stacks—which will have a pretty effect in the sunshine; and while the coronation ceremonial takes place, and the central figure is bombarded by an enthusiastic populace, Alexander the Second will be awaiting the issue of events in a friendly suburban coal-cellar. We have also learned that three months prior to the coronation (yes, coronation's the word) ceremony, such is the confidence of His Majesty in the affection of his subjects that he always puts on in the morning a suit of clothes laid out for somebody else, and before going to bed sneaks down in the kitchen and bribes the cook with a kopeck or two to change sleeping apartments until the morning. Things, however, are much quieter than they used to be. A sawdust-stuffed effigy placed in a chair in what is popularly considered to be the Emperor's private garden, was found last week to have received, after one whole morning's exhibition, only five slugs in the region of the heart; whereas a month ago, after reclining in the Czar's favorite attitude for half an hour, there was a rattle and a crash in the air, and all that was left of the figure was a helmet spike, half an eye-glass, and the order of the Iron Crown. And yet the whole time the misguided nihilists were pounding away at the effigy, the original was administering the government of his Empire—in the drain.

Printers stand second on the list, in point of numbers, in the New York insane asylums. Persons who write for publication should endeavor to improve their chirography.
